Not illustrated. 1872 Excerpt: ... the sea has choked up their mouths with sand; and the inhabitants, who have not a particle of individual energy, are waiting till the Government shall clear them, instead of doing it themselves. Wider and more extensive cuts are to be constructed: their mouths, however, being fitted with large wrought-iron tubes, piercing the sandbank, and running out a considerable distance into the sea, to a point beyond the action of the sand-wave, so that choking will henceforth be impossible, and the storm-waters will always be free to run into the sea in all weathers. 2,000/. would set the matter right, and one season is ample for its execution. The Alexandretta road, after having served for ten years as a field for robbery and extortion of every kind, and cost, so far as it goes, about 22,000/., irrespective of forced labour, without any result, is only about one-third finished, and has been condemned by Mr. Haddan, because the direction chosen is so circuitous, and the inclines so steep, that even if finished (in about 20 years) no one could or would make use of it. He very sensibly points out the utter uselessness of constructing roads in Syria--at any rate in the mountainous portions, and in the, for the most part, swampy plains; no wheel carriages exist, and the people are averse to novelty, and not at all mechanical or given to keeping anything in repair, without which roads and vehicles would not be serviceable for a week in such a severe climate. Mules and camels are the existing methods of transport, and good or bad roads are all one to them; they always prefer the shortest routes, and would most certainly never follow the windings of a carriage road. Where road inclines exceed

1 in 20, a mule can carry more than he can pull; hence carriage roads of steeper ...
