Excerpt: ... their fellow-citizens, the members have given their time and their labor to their country, not only in devising means of relief, but in personally visiting the hospitals and battle-fields, and rendering their aid to the medical officers charged with the immediate care of the sick and wounded. It is impossible for any government to do all needful acts for the disabled after a severe battle. Even under the most favorable circumstances, when there are no false views of economy prevailing, and when supplies are in profusion, there is so often a want of co-ordination in the several departments, so many military circumstances to be considered, so much to be done, and so few to do it, that an amount of suffering exists which no government can obviate. At such times a body of men representing the loyal and charitable people of the country, with ample means, fettered by no military restraints, and combining in themselves, to a certain extent, the functions of the medical, the quartermasters, and the subsistence departments, acts with a degree of promptness and thoroughness which can never be attained under the ordinary military organization. The first duty of the military commander is undoubtedly to gain the victory. Ordnance supplies and food for his men and animals are indispensable. Hospital stores, when there is not room for all, must be left behind for a more convenient season. The Sanitary Commission has but one grand object--the prevention and relief of human suffering. Its wagons and other means of transportation are used for this purpose alone, and hence they are enabled to push forward their supplies frequently days in advance of those belonging to the government. A medical department, with independent means of transportation, could do much to lessen t...
