In the herd which she tended was a large blue bull, which always kept himself so clean and shining, and often came to the Kings daughter, and let her stroke his head. One time, as she thus sate and wept, he came and asked her why she was always so sorrowful, but she made no answer, but only continued to weep. Yes, I know well what ails thee, said the bull, though thou wilt not tell me: it is because the Queen is so cruel to thee, and almost starves thee to death. But for food and drink shalt thou not grieve. In my left ear lies a cloth; when thou takest that out, and spreadest it abroad, thou wilt get to eat and to drink all that thou needest. So that did she: she took out the cloth, and spread it on the green sward, and it was instantly covered with the most delicious dishes that man could desire; and there were also wine, and mead, and honey-cakes. Kari now soon recovered her strength and good looks, and was so blooming, that the Queen and her shrivelled daughter were green and yellow from sheer vexation. The Queen could not conceive how her step-daughter, on such poor fare, should thrive so; and, therefore, she bade one of the maids to follow into the woods, and see how it was; for she suspected that some one of the servants gave her something to eat. The maid followed her into the woods, and watched her, and there she saw her take the cloth out of the ear of the blue bull, and spread it on the grass, and eat sumptuously of the delicious viands that covered it. This the maid related to the Queen. And now the King returned home; he had been
