

THE MOUNTAIN PEOPLE

The Mountain People describes the slow death and destruction of a tribe of African hunters, whose social disintegration parallels in many ways that of our own society. The Ik are a small group of hunters, isolated in the mountains separating Uganda, the Sudan and Kenya, who have been driven from their natural hunting grounds into these barren wastes by the creation of a National Game Reserve - forbidden to chase the animals that once fed them as to become farmers even tho they do not have the experience, the technology and the social organization that would make farming possible. In less than three generations, they have deteriorated from a group of prosperous and daring hunters to scattered bands of hostile people whose only goal is individual survival, and who have learned that the price of survival is to give up compassion, love, affection, kindness and concern - even for their own children. Desmond Morris described this book as beautifully observed and beautifully written.
