Sometimes the border of these caps extends to some length before and behind, and ends in a point; and a cap thus shaped they call in their own language nindne kapperak, which means a cap with a nose. The missionary says, he saw once a cap which belonged to a poor Laplander, and was made of a salmon's skin; it was white, and had square divisions, which were visible where the scales had dropped from the skin. They wear a sort of riding-hood, called by them rtvok, which they use in hunting, or in attending the tame rein-deer whilst seeding. This hood has only a small opening to look through, is close sewed up before, and when it is put on the head covers the breast and moulders: in front there appears a flap, which is called zhialbme-rqft. The men in Lapland very rarely wear any covering about their necks, or whenever they make use of something like it, it consists of a narrow piece of cloth, which only goes once round; so that their throats are always exposed naked, or nearly so, to the severity of the weather. The tunic, or close garment, worn by the Laplander, is called a fork, and is made of sheep's skin with the wool on, the woolly side being inwards: it has a high collar, made stiff with kersey, or other cloth, neatly worked with different coloured threads, and extending a little way down the bosom. As this tunic at the same time serves for a shirt, it has no opening but where it covers the breast; and it is more or less ornamented, according to the condition and fancy of the wearer, with cloth in like manner as the collar, and bordered with otters' skin. On the left side, in front, Vol. II. It is sewed a narrow stripe, or border of cloth or silk; and on the
